Some of the first strikes hit energy, transport and fuel infrastructure, which Russia says serves the military.

The intended targets of the repeat strikes have not been confirmed by investigators or an independent body.

Police are civilians under international humanitarian law unless incorporated into the armed forces; Russia has not said it regards them otherwise.

RESCUERS ARE PROTECTED

Civil defence organisations and their personnel must be respected and protected, and so must medical units and the wounded. Police officers are civilians unless they are incorporated into the armed forces. A second strike on a site where rescuers are working is an attack on people the law protects.
